"Weekend lie-ins could help you avoid an early death" reports The Guardian in May 2018

A 13-year study of more than 43,000 people in Sweden found that regularly sleeping 5 hours or less increased people's chances of dying by 65%, compared to those sleeping around 7 hours. However, there was no increased risk among people who slept 5 hours or less on weekdays but for 7 or more hours at weekends, suggesting the weekend lie-in might compensate for lack of sleep during the week.

The study is the first to look at how differences between sleep on work days and days off might interact. This study also confirmed that people who regularly slept 9 hours or more on both weekdays and weekends also had a higher risk of death.

What were the basic results?

Compared to people who slept 6 or 7 hours on weekdays and weekends:

- people who slept 5 hours or less on weekdays and weekends were 65% more likely to have died during the follow-up period
- people who slept 5 hours or less at weekends were 52% more likely to have died
- people who slept 8 hours or more on weekdays and 9 hours or more on weekends were 25% more likely to have died

Researchers calculated that people with constantly short sleep died approximately 8 months earlier than those constantly sleeping 6 to 7 hours.

Conclusion

This is the first study to suggest that it may be possible to balance out short sleep during the working week with longer sleep on days off. It's an intriguing idea, but the study has some limitations:

- people reported their sleep themselves, which may not be an accurate measurement of sleep time
- information about sleep was only reported at the start of the study, so we don't know how these patterns changed over time
- the type of study means we can't tell whether short sleep actually caused people to die earlier, or whether another factor affecting both sleep and length of life might be more important

*Please note the service is recorded and streamed live during the Divine Service programme.
