"Taking vitamin supplements does not help you live longer but may actually cause you harm, study suggests," reports The Sun, April 9 2019.

A US study reports that vitamin and mineral supplements do not reduce the risk of death. And there's a suggestion that high-dose calcium supplements could actually increase the risk.

The researchers looked at data from more than 30,000 adults in the US. This included a one-off 24-hour dietary recall and whether the adults had taken any dietary supplements in the previous 30 days.

This study does not change current advice. Most people who eat a healthy, balanced diet should already be consuming enough vitamins and minerals without having to worry about whether they need to take supplements.

What kind of research was this?

This was a cohort study, where people are assessed at baseline and then followed up over time to see who ends up with the outcome in question.

With this type of study there's always the potential for unmeasured factors to have had an effect. This is why cohort studies cannot prove cause and effect.

What were the basic results?

During the 6 years of follow-up:

- There were 3,613 deaths, including 805 from cancer.
- Use of any dietary supplements was not associated with reduced risk of death compared with no use.

High-dose calcium supplements increased the risk of death from cancer.

How did the researchers interpret the results?

They said: "The complex interactions among nutrients are likely to play a more important role in determining health outcomes than individual nutrients.

"Thus, our findings on individual nutrients should be considered exploratory and interpreted with caution."

Conclusion

There are very few firm conclusions that can be drawn from this study. This is because of the high number of limitations. Diet and supplement use were only assessed at one point in time. This is likely to change over the course of a person's life. Such dietary recall assessments can also be an inaccurate representation of a person's normal diet due to the day of the week or time of the year the assessment is performed. Estimating portion sizes can also be problematic. There was also a lack of information about whether any of the participants required supplements because of nutrient deficiencies. And the researchers only looked at the risk of death. Supplements may have a range of health benefits depending on individual circumstances.

In summary, this study does not change the current recommended daily intake for levels of nutrients. Unless you have a deficiency, you should be able to get all the nutrients you need through a healthy, balanced diet, apart from vitamin D.
